PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES/MEETINGS ORGANIZED

2017-2022 Planning Committee for the Association for Behavioral and Cognitive Therapies' (ABCT) Annual Convention.

2020 Planning Committee for Mental Health Roundtable Discussion sponsored by the USDA.

05/04 Chief organizer for meeting co-sponsored by The University of Toledo's Psychology Department and the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH). The purpose of the meeting was to develop recommendations regarding mental health, work organization, and psychosocial factors that can be examined in future surveillance of farmworkers through the National Agricultural Workers Survey (NAWS). Participants for the meeting were selected because of their expertise in mental health or psychosocial risk factors affecting farmworkers and/or Latino/a immigrants or other minority groups.

EXAMPLES OF RESEARCH PROJECTS IN PROGRESS

Experience of Pain and Suicide Behavior in Latino/a Emerging Adults
Although previous research findings indicate that pain tolerance and pain sensitivity are associated with suicide behavior, research has yet to examine these in Latino/a individuals. We are thus examining—through the utilization of lab-based measures including cold water pressor and algometer—the relationship between pain, suicide behavior, and comorbid variables in young Latino/a adults.

Evaluation of the Salud Para Todos Program in Michigan, Colorado, and North Carolina:
The Salud Para Todos Program utilizes promotoras—farmworkers trained to provide education and prevention activities—to educate farmworkers in the areas of mental health diagnoses, interventions, and coping. This project assessed whether farmworkers who receive services (e.g., educational workshops, group support, individual assistance) from promotoras report reduced levels of migrant farmworker stress and depression and increased knowledge of risk factors for stress and depression.

Development and Translation of Coping Instrument for Acculturating Individuals:
Although research on acculturative stress and mental health has grown, there is a paucity of research that has examined coping in acculturating individuals. To better assess how individuals cope during the acculturative process, we have developed and are bilingually assessing a new coping tool, called the Coping Inventory, that measures the effectiveness of various coping styles used in reaction to acculturative and everyday stressors.

Relationship of Cyberbullying through Social Media and Suicide Behavior:
Although case examples of cyberbullying and suicide are often reported in the media, research on the topic is scant. This project thus examines the direct influence of cyberbullying through social media (i.e., Facebook, Instagram, Twitter, SnapChat, TikTok, online gaming, text messaging, emails) on depression and suicide behavior, as well as its moderating influence on anxiety sensitivity and social anxiety in creating suicide risk.

Rumination, Anxiety Sensitivity and Suicide Behavior:
Although rumination's role in depression is well-documented, research on rumination and suicide behavior is lacking. This study thus examines the influence of rumination on suicidal thoughts and behavior through depression, hopelessness, and a reduced ability to problem solve. The project also examines whether rumination and anxiety sensitivity interact with burdensomeness to increase suicidality and whether they increase one's desensitization to painful stimuli.

Examination of Mediators between Religiosity and Suicide Behavior:
Although research has long found that religiosity is related to positive mental health, scant research has examined explanatory factors in this relationship. This project thus assesses religious social support, self-efficacy, and coping competence as possible mediators with the expectation that these factors help explain the connection between religiosity and mental health factors including anxiety, depression, and suicide behaviors.

Quality of Sleep and Suicide Behavior:

This longitudinal research project utilized ActiGraph technology to assess the impact of sleep quality on suicide behavior. Risk and protective factors assessed included depression, perceived stress, worry, perseverative cognitions and rumination, pre-sleep behavior and arousal, and physical activity.

Marianismo and Suicide Behaviors in Latina Adolescents:
Data from the Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System has consistently indicated that Latina adolescents report greater suicide ideation and attempts compared to other adolescent groups. It has been suggested that these data may be explained by family stress and conflict due to intergenerational differences in traditional values. To examine this, in a sample of Mexican female adolescents, this project explores the influence of marianismo (traditional gender role expectations for Latina individuals) on family conflict and, in turn, suicide behavior. As an additional explanatory factor, we are also examining the moderating influence of emotion regulation on family conflict and suicide behavior.

Obesity and Suicide Behavior in Latina Young Adults:
Although epidemiological studies have found that obesity is associated with suicide behavior in young women, scant research has examined variables that explain this relationship. The first phase of this project utilized American College Health Association data from UTRGV and found that that the positive association between obesity and suicidal ideation was significantly mediated by sleep problems, health problems, and dissatisfaction with personal appearance. In the project's second phase, my lab is examining other possible mediators in the relationship between obesity and suicide behavior in individuals in south Texas, a region which has one of the highest rates of obesity in the U.S. These include body shame, guilt, frustration with dieting and not losing weight, and social anxiety.

Using Machine Learning Techniques to Assess Suicide Behavior in Latino/a Individuals:
This project is utilizing machine learning to precisely assess the relative influences of traditional risk factors and culturally-based factors on suicide behaviors in Latin adults.

Psychological Reactions to the COVID-19 Pandemic in Essential Workers in the United States:
This project, in collaboration with several colleagues at UTRGV, is longitudinally assessing the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on the mental health of frontline essential workers in the United States. Individuals we are tracking include individuals working in health care, retail services, delivery services, and first responders.

Mental-Health Seeking Behavior in Latino Men:
This project is assessing the influence of traditional cultural values on Latino men's willingness to seek mental health treatment—both in-person and via telemental health.

Dental Care Beliefs Across Ethnic Groups:
Dental fear often leads to dental phobia which often results in poor oral health. Over time, poor oral health can contribute to a multitude of health complications including heart disease, diabetes, kidney disease, Crohn's Disease, pneumonia, and bronchitis. Given that different cultures may hold differing views about dental care and that these may influence frequency of care, oral health literacy, and susceptibility to dental fear, we are using mixed methods to examine dental care beliefs within and between ethnic groups including Caucasian, Latino/a, African American, and Asian individuals. This project is in collaboration with Andrew Geers, Ph.D., University of Toledo.

Body Image, Cyberbullying through Social Media, and Suicide Behavior in College Students:
My lab is conducting a series of studies examining how various body image variables (e.g., body esteem, body shame, body ideal internalization) interact with social variables (e.g., social anxiety; social comparison) to enhance susceptibility to cyberbullying through social media, thus increasing the risk for depression and suicide behavior.

Aquaphobia and Lack of Swimming Skills in Latino/a Youth:
Research has indicated that, compared to youth in other ethnic groups, Latino/a youth have higher rates of drowning and less ability to swim. Research however has yet to explore the association of swimming skills and aquaphobia. If indeed these are related, then providing effective aquaphobia interventions may lead to a greater willingness to learn to swim and, in turn, less water-related accidents and drownings. My lab is conducting a series of studies on the relationship between swimming skills and aquaphobia. In a national sample of adolescents across ethnic groups, we expect that Latino/a youth will report lower swimming skills, greater levels of aquaphobia, and a stronger association between swimming skills and aquaphobia. In a second study, we are examining these factors in Latino/a youth in the Rio Grande Valley, with a special focus on possible etiological factors in aquaphobia development.

Perceived Sense of Loss, Psychache, and Suicide Behavior in Latino/a Youth:
Although, long ago, the concept of psychache—derived from frustrated psychological needs—was hypothesized to be a strong proximal indicator of suicide behavior, remarkably little research has been done on the topic. My lab is thus conducting a mixed methods study that is examining how perceived sense of loss in one's life (an example of a frustrated psychological need) contributes to psychache and, in turn, suicide behavior.
